Silence in such cases is supposed to arise, either from a disregard to public opinion, or from a conscious inability to satisfy it; on the other hand, a defence is a flattering appeal to the judgment of the public. While many will be unable to detect the false logic of the defence, the partisans of the government will insist that the argument is irresistible, and pour obloquy on all who fail to acknowledge its force. The Rev. gentleman who at the last anniversary began his speech with declaring that there was no occasion for an apology for the Society, and concluded with the exhortation never, never apologize, evinced more impulsive zeal than sound judgment. The Society had been arraigned at the bar of the public for its avowed neutrality on the Slavery question and all the immoralities necessarily connected with human bondage, and likewise for its careful expurgation of Anti-Slavery sentiments from its reprints. Eminent Christians, both lay and clerical, secular and religious newspapers, individual churches and ecclesiastical bodies, had all remonstrated against this course. But the advice of the Rev. orator was followed, and the managers, in their dignity, gave no sign that a murmur of dissatisfaction reached their ears. At length a city church, and one of undoubted evangelical sentiments, voted to discontinue for the future its usual congregational collections for the Society. Matters now began to look...
