Excerpt: . . . flower, the daily haunts and darling idols of his, by turns dreary, and dreamy boyhood, in verse, which in its low touching wails of mournfulest melody--passionate gushings of intensified love and fervid worship, --and alas! also in its fierce and fearless tempest tones of political anathema, will live whilst the English tongue is spoken on the earth. Don, lies blue below, And Wincobank before me, rising green Calls from the south, the silver Rother flow, And smiles on moors beyond, and meads between; Unrivalld landscape! Oh, it is a scene That to remembrance brings the hope-blessed days, But not their hope! From Withered Wild Floureri Love-listening Rother, thou wilt hear no more Her guilty whisper on thy silent shore! As when she trembled, hung her head, and wept, Sweet as the flower on which the moonbeams slept, Wan as the snow-white ro9e in Catcliffes vale, But not like it, in stainless meekness pale. From They Met Again. Thy sisters, in the vales left far behind, Are dead, late coming primrose! months ago They faded slowly in the pensive wind: Thou smiles!--yes, the happy will do so, Careless of others wrongs and others woe. Carnationed childhoods favourite! thou, too, here Ay, roses die, but daisies always grow. Skeleton ash! why lag behind the year Where Don and Rother meet, no half clad boughs appear. From Winhill THRYBERGH. Scenes of my thoughtless youth! here are ye all; Dalton, and Dalton School! and Dalton Deign! But changd...
