Excerpt: . . . use in the case of young rabbits. The food of the Polish may be much the same as that given to any other variety of rabbit, although it should be remembered that this variety is very subject to looseness, as already mentioned, and the supply of succulent food should therefore be kept under the usual mark. The best way to guard against these unpleasant complaints, with their more or less dangerous concomitants, is not to give such food as lettuce or cabbage, the latter especially, in large quantities. A few dried beech-leaves or heath, if the rabbits will eat it, will always be good; and the more palatable green food should be gathered over night, and given a little dry, to avoid the evil effects of too much moisture. A little fresh green food may be given as a treat, but not to much...
