DENIAL: A TALE OF LOVE, SEX, AND MODERN-DAY MADNESS

CreateSpace Independent Publishing Platform. Paperback. Book Condition: New. This item is printed on demand. Paperback. 266 pages. Dimensions: 8.5in. x 5.5in. x 0.7in. In his youth Joseph Voke developed severe tension headaches whenever he involved himself with a female. He diagnosed the problem: repressed anger and resentment. And he employed a solution: recognize the anger/resentment when it happens, accept it for what it is, and then let the other people involved know about it. It worked: it cleared up his headaches. So at age 25 he vowed to employ this same method to his shyness toward people for whom he felt affection. Unfortunately for Joseph Voke, this included women. This is the story of struggling college instructor who let himself feel affection for three women other than his wife. Though he had not lost affection for his wife, nor had he any intention of replacing her with any of these other women, he nevertheless could not deny his affection for them. The novel chronicles the events that lead Joseph Voke, a personally very honest though professionally relatively unsuccessful man, to near psychological destruction as his affections for three women set off a string of events that splits his universe in half: one half aligning with his wife, her family and friends, and the medical profession; the other half aligning with his own view of himself. His self image of man wishing to overcome his shyness and deal honestly with his feelings is severely challenged by his wife's view of him as a man with a chemical imbalance and by the psychological professions view of him as a man suffering from a psychological disorder. Throughout the book Voke analyzes himself and his situation through his interaction with St. Augustine, representing a Christian response to his behavior, Charles Darwin, representing an evolutionary explanation,...
