Excerpt: . . . And roseate hues illuminate its sky, Soft summer winds play gently to and fro, And in the silence speaks that still, small voice Elijah heard upon the mountains top, After the earthquake, wind and fire. And As he wrapped his face within his mantle, So let us reverently listen when God speaks to us, saying, What dost thou here For, like the prophet, we can hear His voice Best, after the earthquake, wind and fire, When, tried by contest with earths elements, We stand in holy calm upon the mount To listen to the words of inspiration, Obedient to follow where they bid, The opening way to Gods work and to ours. Kate Raymond was a dreamer. I mean not That she was listless or was indolent; She had indeed within her slender frame A soul of energy, which spurred her on To active enterprise and earnest work. Rut, even as a child, she oft sat As if unconscious of the world around, With lips half-parted and with eyes that gazed Into what others called but vacancy, Yet to her sight was peopled with a throng Of beatific presences she loved. These gave her sweet companionship. Smiling, They pointed to one path then another; And Kate, looking adown some shining track, Would whisper to herself, When I am grown I will do thus and so. I choose this way. Her father, a prosaic, honest man, Seeing his little daughter thus absorbed, Would cry, See,...
