Brand New Book ***** Print on Demand *****.Excerpt from A Description of the Rational Method in Reading To make apparent the conditions that gave rise to the Rational Method in Reading, as well as to provide a proper basis for the discussion of that method, it will be necessary - first, to consider what reading is - and second, to examine briefly the several methods that have been employed in teaching it. Reading is thought-getting through word-getting; thought-getting the purpose or fulfillment, word-getting the means. The process then is a double one, mechanical and intellectual, and both mechanical and intellectual skill are necessary to its accomplishment. In the teaching of reading, no method can be called unless it leads to independence and rapidity in word-getting, and prevents word-getting from interfering with thought-getting. The power of getting words quickly is the first essential to thought-getting from the written or printed text; and only when the word-getting has become so rapid as to be almost automatic, or the mind has become trained to attending to the mechanical part of the work without neglecting the intellectual, can it be said that word-getting does not interfere with thought-getting. Primary schools, nearly everywhere, are to-day sending out children who have labored four years to learn to read, and yet are not ready or intelligent readers, because slowness and uncertainty in word-getting remain as obstacles to thought-getting.
